BOOK MANUSCRIPT

Title: Deliberative Democratic Justice in Global Affairs.

Abstract: Which democratic principles are relevant to a globalizing world? And what does deliberative democracy say about the structure of global governance, human rights regimes and immigration policies?

To address these questions, I articulate principles of a global deliberative democracy, providing criteria for evaluating decision-making structures at multiple levels of global governance and requiring varied participation avenues for differently affected people. I revisit the foundation of deliberative democracy and argue that it is best understood as a theory of political justice, articulate a conception of global public reason, and offer a pluralistic account of the all-affected principle as a response to democracy's boundary problem. I then apply my theory to questions of global political justice by defending accounts of global governance as a nested hierarchy, human rights as membership in the global political community, and immigration regimes that incorporate voices of would-be immigrants.
